Influential Women Features Patricia “Patty” Abell: A Career Defined By Lifelong Learning, Leadership And Service

LOUISVILLE, KY, UNITED STATES, September 9, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- From More Than Four Decades of Professional Experience to Meaningful Community Involvement, Patty Abell Continues to Demonstrate That Growth, Purpose and Impact Can Flourish at Every Stage of Life

Louisville, Kentucky – Patricia “Patty” Abell, a seasoned administrative professional and community leader in Louisville, Kentucky, has built a remarkable career defined by perseverance, continuous learning, relationship-building and an enduring commitment to helping others succeed. With more than four decades of diverse professional experience, Patty has demonstrated that professional fulfillment is not limited by age or circumstance, but instead grows through the willingness to embrace change, learn from others and step confidently beyond familiar boundaries.

Today, Patty serves as an Executive Assistant at EY, where she provides high-level administrative support to 10 professionals located across the United States. In a role requiring organization, discretion, adaptability and strong interpersonal skills, she manages complex calendars, coordinates travel, handles executive correspondence, oversees expense reporting and supports a broad range of administrative operations. Her contributions help leadership teams remain focused on their clients and broader professional responsibilities.

For Patty, however, success has never been measured solely by professional accomplishments. She attributes much of her journey to continuous learning, hard work and the meaningful relationships and mentorships she has developed along the way. She also embraces the mindset of “laughing and learning” each day, a philosophy that encourages her to remain humble while continually seeking opportunities to grow.

“I attribute my success to continuous learning, hard work, and the meaningful relationships and mentorships I have built throughout my journey,” Patty explains. “I also believe in the importance of staying humble and embracing the mindset of ‘laughing and learning’ each day.”

That philosophy has remained a constant throughout a career that has taken Patty through multiple industries and professional environments.

A Career Built on Adaptability and Perseverance

Before joining EY in 2020, Patty spent a decade with the University of Louisville, working in finance and administration within the physical plant department. Her time at the university represented an important chapter in her professional development, particularly because she simultaneously pursued higher education while balancing work and family responsibilities.

Patty completed her Bachelor of Science degree during this period, demonstrating a level of perseverance that has become one of the defining characteristics of her professional story. Rather than viewing career development as something that must happen early in life, she embraced education and advancement when the opportunity presented itself.

Her career prior to the university was equally influential. Patty spent 28 years working at a bowling center, where she developed and led a highly successful youth bowling program. Under her leadership, the program grew to more than 200 participants, allowing her to combine organizational abilities with mentorship and community involvement.

Her contributions to youth athletics and organized bowling ultimately earned her recognition from both the Louisville Women’s Bowling Association Hall of Fame and the National Bowling Conference Hall of Fame. These honors reflect not only her commitment to the sport but also the lasting impact she made on young people and the local community.

Through every professional transition, Patty has remained willing to learn and adapt. Her career demonstrates how experiences that may initially appear unrelated can collectively create a powerful foundation of skills, perspective and confidence.

The Importance of Speaking Up

One of the most influential pieces of career advice Patty received came during her first year at EY. Her manager encouraged her to stop holding back her ideas and begin sharing her suggestions more confidently.

The advice had a lasting impact.

Patty had sometimes hesitated to offer ideas, but her manager reminded her that the only way others could evaluate a suggestion was if she was willing to put it forward. The worst possible outcome, she learned, was simply hearing that an idea would not work.

That lesson quickly proved valuable. Patty recalls suggesting practical solutions, including creating a spreadsheet that helped one of the partners she supported track information more efficiently. The idea was simple, but its usefulness demonstrated that valuable improvements do not always have to be complicated.

The experience reinforced an important principle that Patty now shares with others: speak up, contribute ideas and do not be afraid of hearing no.

For Patty, leadership is not necessarily about having the loudest voice in the room. It is about having the confidence to contribute when something could make a difference.

Encouraging the Next Generation
Patty encourages young women entering the administrative profession to approach their careers with curiosity and an open mind.

Her advice is simple: be a sponge.

She encourages emerging professionals to absorb as much information as possible, listen carefully, learn from the people around them and remain receptive to new perspectives. She also believes they should not be afraid to offer suggestions, even when they are unsure how those ideas will be received.

Another habit Patty strongly recommends is keeping a pen and paper—or another convenient way to capture ideas—close at hand. She believes that when a statement, piece of advice or observation resonates with someone, there is a reason it stays in their mind.

Patty herself frequently writes down ideas or sends herself emails containing thoughts she wants to remember and revisit later.

She also believes that administrative professionals have a unique opportunity to learn through relationships. People who enjoy meeting others, understanding different personalities and discovering different cultures can find the profession particularly rewarding.

For Patty, that learning never becomes repetitive. Every person, situation and workplace can offer something new.

Recognizing Challenges While Embracing Opportunity
Patty also recognizes that women continue to face challenges surrounding professional recognition and advancement in some workplace environments. While progress has been made, she believes there are still situations in which women must work harder to ensure their contributions are seen and their voices are heard.

At the same time, Patty sees significant opportunities emerging through women's professional networks, mentorship programs and leadership initiatives. These resources can help women build confidence, expand their professional relationships and create pathways toward greater responsibility.

Her own experience underscores the importance of having mentors who encourage professionals to recognize their own capabilities and speak with confidence.

Family, Faith and Community at the Center
Although Patty has achieved significant professional milestones, she considers family her greatest accomplishment.

She is the proud mother of four adult children and grandmother of five grandchildren. Her youngest child, her only daughter, is also her best friend, and the two speak every day. Two of her children live out of state—one in Charlotte, North Carolina, and another in Boise, Idaho—which makes the time they spend together especially meaningful.

Family has also shaped Patty's perspective on resilience, compassion and purpose.

Outside of her professional responsibilities, Patty serves as a Family Formation Catechist at St. Bernard Catholic Church, where she teaches and mentors second- and third-grade students in Catholic faith formation and kindness initiatives. Her volunteer work reflects her belief that service and mentorship can make a difference at every age.

Her faith, family and community involvement have become important sources of purpose throughout her life.

Turning Personal Experiences Into Advocacy
Patty is also passionate about raising awareness around colon cancer and autism. These causes are particularly meaningful to her because of experiences within her family and the people she loves.

She is committed to looking for solutions and encouraging positive change, particularly regarding autism and the broader social systems surrounding autistic children and families. With a grandson who is nonverbal autistic, Patty believes that society must continue exploring ways to provide better support, protection and educational opportunities for children with autism.

She advocates for approaches that recognize the individual needs of each child rather than focusing primarily on numbers or generalized measures. In her view, education should account for what each child is experiencing and identify ways to help that individual thrive.

Her perspective reflects the same values that have guided her professional life: listen, learn, recognize individual strengths and look for opportunities to improve.

A Life of Purpose and Continued Growth
When she is not working or volunteering, Patty enjoys spending time with family, scrapbooking and completing 1,000-piece jigsaw puzzles. She has a particular appreciation for photographs and enjoys preserving memories through traditional scrapbooking. Her three dogs also provide plenty of companionship while she works from home.

Patty's personal and professional journey has been marked by significant accomplishments, difficult transitions, new opportunities and continued growth. Through every stage, she has maintained a positive outlook and a willingness to learn.

Her story is ultimately one of reinvention and resilience. From leading a youth bowling program of more than 200 participants, to earning her degree while balancing professional and family responsibilities, to supporting executives across the country at EY, Patty has consistently demonstrated the value of showing up, staying curious and remaining open to change.

Her message is particularly relevant for professionals who may believe that their most significant opportunities for growth have already passed. Patty's career offers a different perspective: there is always another lesson to learn, another relationship to build, another idea to share and another opportunity to make a difference.

With decades of experience behind her and the same curiosity that has driven her throughout her career, Patty continues to approach each day with purpose. Her professional achievements, commitment to service and dedication to family stand as a testament to a life built not simply around career success, but around learning, contribution and helping others thrive.
