

Smart Candle Offers Battery Powered Candles For National Cut Your Energy Costs Day

/EINPresswire.com/ National Cut Your Energy Costs Day falls on January 10th, 2013. Incorporating battery powered candles, like the ones sold by online retailer Smart Candle, into your home is a great way to reduce household energy consumption.

As more and more people across the country become concerned about the environment, the level of interest in finding ways to conserve and minimize energy use has risen. Studies have shown that most Americans are also still struggling to make ends meet, despite unemployment claims dropping in the last few months. The combination of economic trouble and interest in energy efficiency means more people than ever will be celebrating National Cut Your Energy Costs Day, which falls on January 10th, 2013.

The Department of Energy reports that most Americans spend around $2000 annually on their energy bill. The nation's dependence on energy to power everything from homes and computers to cars and planes can be viewed as a bad thing. The science fiction TV show Revolution shows one possible outcome should citizens of the world lose the ability to use as much electricity as they want. In this fictional reality, the lack of power causes widespread panic, leading modern society to collapse. Though this is simply one fictional possible outcome, it illustrates the need for Americans to reduce dependence on energy and find alternative ways to live modern life.

Smart Candles, the battery powered LED flameless candles, are a great item to incorporate into the home on National Cut Your Energy Costs Day. Using standard batteries, Smart Candles provide ambiance and light without any power source. Through their website, the company also offers Energizer® brand accent lighting that employs the same technology. There are also covered holders available that give the LED flameless candles the look and function of a small lantern.

In addition to battery powered LED flameless candles, Smart Candle also offers rechargeable flameless candles. Many of the candles offered come with optional remotes and timers, making them even more user friendly.
