EAGLE CREEK, OR, UNITED STATES, September 24, 2026 / EINPresswire.com/ -- Stalcup Roofing & Construction, an Oregon-licensed roofing contractor based in Eagle Creek, has a four-item roof inspection checklist aimed at helping residential and commercial property owners across the Portland metro area identify potential problems before severe weather or seasonal changes cause expensive damage.

Check the surface of your roof's shingles. Keep an eye out for cracks, curls, bare spots or worn-away materials.
Flashing (metal around chimneys, vents, skylights and other equipment) should be checked over too. Look for chalky or dried-out sealant and rusted or broken metal.
Gutters are important for both your roof's health and your home's foundation. Make sure they are not separating from the roofline, aren't rusted through and don't have any leaks.
Inside, you should check for discoloration on ceilings.

While you can get away with ground-level inspections twice a year, some issues require getting up on steep roofs.

"Oregon property owners who stay ahead of routine roof maintenance are far less likely to face emergency repairs after a major storm," said Jay Peters, owner of Stalcup Roofing & Construction. "A basic visual check a few times a year, and a professional inspection when conditions change, can make a huge difference in the long-term performance of any roofing system."

If there’s an issue that you can’t find the source of, you aren’t able to get onto your roof safely or don’t have the proper equipment, it may be time to call in the experts. For those questionable areas, Stalcup Roofing & Construction advises against attempting to fix the issue yourself. A qualified roofing professional should evaluate those areas instead so there’s no risk of injury to you or your loved ones.
