

Can a Car Accident Victim Be Compensated for Injuries While in a Coma?

/EINPresswire.com/ Often times, car accident victims are left with very serious injuries that leave them unable to do the work of seeking legal compensation from those liable for what they have endured. When a car accident victim is left in a coma after an accident, it is impossible for them to find their own effective legal counsel for a claim, as medical costs and other expenses mount without their having the ability to take care of things. The Dallas SUV accident lawyers of 1-800-Car-Wreck say a personal injury claim can be filed on behalf of injured accident victims in these circumstances.

There is a statute of limitations for filing a claim for personal injury. A serious car accident can leave a patient in a state of a coma for years; however, and waiting for them to come out of it before seeking compensation in the event that others are responsible can be a hindrance to their ability to obtain what is fair in court. Those who have power of attorney can obtain legal help on behalf of their loved ones so that the process of filing a claim can be started in a timely manner.

A Dallas car wreck lawyer can help those with questions about a specific car accident injury case assess their legal options. If a person has a loved one who has been left in a coma as a result of a car accident, an attorney could offer a free consultation so that their questions can be answered regarding matters such as who is eligible to file on behalf of the injured victim?
