"Energy Connection can reduce business consumer utility bills by up to 30% in some cases. Now that utilities are deregulated, consumers have a choice in who provides them with their energy. Energy Connection helps consumers reach those alternative providers and secures reduced rates at the same time," said John Pelts, Vice President of Sales at Energy Connection (<http://www.energyconnectionsite.com/>).

Energy Connection maintains strong business relationships with large, national utility providers as well as proven, smaller regional providers in order to obtain the best rates for their clients. The company works with many niche markets and works hard to match the client with the right supplier.

Before any contracts are signed, John Pelts visits customer sites to perform energy audits as a way to identify conservation and cost-savings opportunities. Part of his analysis includes developing an understanding of the business itself, including its goals, challenges and operations in order to match the supplier with the customer.

"As far as energy efficiency goes, many of our partners are at the forefront of developing and providing green energy solutions. So whenever a consumer partners with Energy Connection they are investing in green technology and using less fossil fuels than if they were to stay with their original utility provider. In many cases, switching to Energy Connection protects consumers from future utility rate increases as well," noted John Pelts.

John Pelts is a proven business professional with more than twenty years of experience in Sales and Customer Relationship Management positions. Pelts uses this experience to match his Energy Connection clients with the best utility solution for their situation.
