

The Power of Video Evidence in Truck Crash Cases

Eberstein & Witherite truck wreck lawyers discuss how video provides strong evidence for truck crash cases.

DALLAS, TX, USA, September 24, 2014 /EINPresswire.com/ -- A video recording is one of the most powerful pieces of evidence that can be used in proving what happened in any traffic accident. When it comes to serious truck wrecks, this type of evidence is not always available, but it can go a long way in determining the circumstances of a crash. Drivers typically have differing stories about what happened, particularly if they have done something to contribute to the accident and don't want that made known. Sometimes bystanders use their cell phone to record truck accidents they see in progress. Sometimes video is captured through surveillance devices installed in the area. This was the case of one very serious Texas truck accident where a semi-truck fell through a major interstate.

According to the Texas based truck wreck attorneys of the Eberstein & Witherite law firm, there are many cases where victims don't live to tell the stories of what happened to cause their truck crash. When such tragedies occur those who have witnessed serious accidents or have access to video footage of an accident can be helpful to the process of investigating these matters to get to the truth when they come forward.

Regardless of whether video footage is available to help identify the circumstances of a semi truck accident; however, a thorough investigation can still be carried out to help provide answers to key questions that may not be immediately known. The Eberstein & Witherite law firm has decades of experience ensuring that the accidents of their clients who have been injured due to the negligence or misconduct of truck drivers or companies are fully investigated. They can also find out whether surveillance footage is available or whether there were witnesses to an accident that can offer insight into what occurred.
