Most people have taken an antibiotic to treat a bacterial infection, certainly, including the infection of the prostate. Now researchers from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the University of San Diego, La Jolla, reveal that the way we often think about antibiotics - as straightforward killing machines - needs to be revised. Based on this report, it shows that antibiotics give rise to new communities of harmful bacteria. And other side effects can also be found in many prostatitis patients. This is where we're way behind - patients don't know what antibiotics mean, doctors don't want to tell patients they're going to be chemically castrated.
