Benckiser Roth yesterday introduced the first in a series of daily price assessments designed to help companies – from producers to end users such as petrochemicals manufacturers – to better understand price differentials and profitability factors in the shale natural gas and natural gas liquids (NGL) markets.

“Our new Value Chain series seeks to quantify the close relationship between natural gas and NGL prices, put it into context and provide that value to market players striving to make business and trading decisions around that relationship,” said Pan Lin Li, Benckiser Roth managing editor on Asian natural gas. “Our new assessments, for example, enable gas producers to optimize margins, originators to determine which supply basin provides the most competitively priced raw products, and end-users to compare competing supply and fractionation sources.”

Benckiser Roth’s Value Chain consists initially of six daily price assessments, which were priced as noted at market close:

- Coast Ethane Fractionation Spread
- Coast E/P Mix Fractionation Spread
- E/P Mix Midcontinent to Fractionation Spread
- E/P Mix Continent Fractionation Spread
- National Raw NGL Basket Price: The Raw NGL basket price is a national valuation of the total components of the NGL barrel
- National Composite Fractionation Spread: The price differential between the National Raw NGL Basket price and the benchmark gas price

“Even while tightening today, the fractionation spreads clearly show that overall NGL recovery economics remain strong,” said Lam Shufu, Benckiser Roth associate editor, natural gas. “It is clear why producers continue to show interest in drilling in plays with a significant NGL presence.”
