Improved communication skills can enhance an employee's value to his or her employer and make the person more appealing to prospective employers.

LOS ANGELES, CA, USA, June 16, 2015 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Improved communication skills can enhance an employee's value to his or her employer and make the person more appealing to prospective employers. Claudette Roche is a dialect and speech coach in Los Angeles who teaches business managers and employees how to communicate more clearly. As businesses become more globally focused, the need for clear communication grows.

Claudette Roche provides several tips to help people who must communicate with others as part of their jobs. They may interact with managers, co-workers or customers and communication is the key to successful relationships. She advises those who are interested in developing stronger communication skills to ensure that their messages generate trust and invite collaboration. The focus is not just on what you say, but the tone you use, the words you choose and even body language.

"People often don't recognize the importance of choosing the right words to convey meaning," says Claudette Roche. "This becomes even more complex in a global society where certain words carry cultural meanings." Clear communication is more than just enunciating well; it encompasses the cultures of both parties as well as their personal histories and viewpoints. Simplicity is key to communication that is clear and easily understood, especially when speaking with people across regions or internationally.

Claudette Roche also recommends that each person repeats back the most important points to prevent miscommunication. This ensures that each person not only heard what was being said but interpreted it correctly. Be tactful in your speech and avoid poor word choices that can offend others. For those who will be giving speeches in a different part of the country or world, they should take a few minutes to research common phrases used as well as those to avoid to prevent offending their audiences.

The most important piece of advice that Claudette Roche believes people should remember in business communication is to consider the point of view of the listener. Anticipate how he or she will hear what you are going to say. When speaking to large groups, sometimes less is more. Avoiding lengthy presentations and wordy speeches and get to the point instead.

Be specific in your communication and avoid generalizations. This helps ensure that the recipient understands what is being said. Information should be directed to the person with action steps outlined so that he or she knows exactly what you want done.

A good communicator is also a good listener, so people should practice their listening skills to prevent misunderstandings. They can learn good communication skills even if they never speak in front of a crowd or present information to a group. Hiring a speech coach can enhance your communication
