Los Angeles, CA - Marines are known for being protective and expertly trained to defend the country, and two United States Marines stationed at Camp Pendleton have expanded that circle of defense by designing a new App that helps keep children safe and families connected.

OGO, or Operation Get Out, is a mobile app that runs on a cell phone. Unlike bulky security devices that can easily be forgotten or identification jewelry that may or may not be worn, OGO functions on a device that few people are likely to forget – their phones.

The technology and idea is based on the Amber Alert system, which uses cell phones as a way of locating and protecting children. Marines Mason Mangum and Blake Altman developed the idea with hopes of eradicating child trafficking once and for all. The color-coded alert buttons on the app are easy for kids to use and works in almost any situation or reception area. With a simple touch, kids can alert their parents immediately if they are in danger, or simply want to share their current location.

personal peace-of-mind

“We kept hearing about children being kidnapped, hurt and even killed. We are family men, and decided it was time to do something about it” said Mason

About OGO:

The founders of OGO believe we own our tomorrow because we are creating it today. Everything that we say, think and do will always have a direct impact on what we want our tomorrow to be. They faithfully believe that there is more good in this world than there is bad. OGO wants to encourage everyone to follow their dreams and help us create a better tomorrow here in America and all over the World.
