The synthetic version to be launched by The Longevity Revolution™ is a bio-identical peptide with the same molecular structure as GcMAF found naturally in the human body but is made in a specialised peptide laboratory and does not use any animal products, human products, or human blood extract which caused most of the recent controversy.

It is being priced at around half that of the recent controversial product yet offers tens of thousands of times the quantity.

GcMAF has had 25 years of research in the scientific community since it was discovered and as a peptide is found naturally in the bodies of at least six million healthy people on the planet. Research papers have been published by hundreds of eminent scientists that refer to it but, until recently, these have been largely ignored. As a natural human peptide it can't be patented by the pharmaceutical industry to give them financial exclusivity to it. Recent changes in patent law in the USA has recognised that an exact molecular synthetic version of a natural peptide can no longer be patented either.

The Longevity Revolution™ will be making small quantities of the peptide available in powder form for less than £200 including worldwide delivery but initially only for research purposes to members who join their free but established worldwide co-researchers club.

It is not yet being made available to the public and is supplied without any medical or therapeutic
