

America's Top Mining Photographer Moves His Studio - 3,000 Feet Under-ground Again!

Barrick Hemlo The Site of Palmer's Last Shoot

THUNDER BAY, ONTARIO, CANADA, November 2, 2015 /EINPresswire.com/ -- When is a photo studio one half mile under the ground?

When Thunder Bay, Ontario based photographer Kevin Palmer is photographing a Cubex Orion ITH Drill at the Barrick Gold, Hemlo site.

Confronted with the challenge of creating an impactful image of this complicated piece of mining machinery, Kevin relied on the skills he's developed as both a studio and adventure photographer, his unflinching energy and his determination to solve any problem.

In order to create this photo, Kevin, with the assistance of machine operator Joe Bothello and Mine Supervisor Kerry O'Halloran, set up a virtual photo studio in the mine, utilizing an assortment of lights on high and medium power, a fill light plus two softboxes.

As Kevin said, "It took hours to get to and then into the mine, another five hours to set up and experiment and two and a half minutes to shoot." Only a perfectionist thinks in those terms.

What was Kevin's biggest problem? "Power. The high demand for electricity by our power packs kept kicking off the circuit breakers. We solved the problem by running extension cords to a nearby compressor, splitting the power requirement from each in half. I couldn't position the lights exactly where I wanted to

Safety and the Environment are of primary concern at Barrick
