

Salmon Eggs Skin Treatment Called Fishy by Industry Experts

New generation of cosmetic ingredient is raising concerns for some dermatologists.

SCOTTSDALE, ARIZONA, UNITED STATES, February 22, 2016 /EINPresswire.com/ -- (Scottsdale, AZ) Celebrities like Gwyneth Paltrow are calling salmon egg enzymes one of the greatest skin care treatments for women on the market. But this growing cosmetic trend is leading to great concern for experts who question the credibility of such products.

A growing number of women are being treated by a natural enzyme that originates from salmon eggs when babies are hatched. This unique skin care treatment is receiving rave reviews, but not from everyone. "Enzymes have been used in the cosmetic industry for years," said Natalya Borakowski. The owner and licensed aesthetician of Desert Bloom Skin Care Center in Scottsdale, Az. points out that there is nothing new or exciting about it.

Borakowski acknowledges that enzymes from salmon eggs are gentle and do not cause peeling or irritation. However, some companies that are promoting such proprietary products may be misleading the public. "I am skeptical about these types of treatments due to a lack of research data and high cost. Charging consumers more than $200 for a skin care product containing ingredients with no proof of effectiveness is wrong." She says more expensive rarely means better quality. "There are better skin care products currently on the market that cost significantly less."

One beauty contestant is so completely enamored by the enzymes treatment that she uses the product twice a day. Although she claims to have noticed major improvement in the quality of her skin, Borakowski points out that the woman is doing more harm than good. "It is not wise to exfoliate your skin daily. Skin cells grow and renew. They are needed to protect the exterior of your skin. Over exfoliation will only leave your skin exposed."
