

Crime Healer: A Profession for the Brave at Heart

While doctors and other medical professionals provide cures for ailing people, law enforcement personnel offer remedies for city and community crimes.

WEST HEMPSTEAD, NEW YORK, UNITED STATES, May 30, 2016 /EINPresswire.com/ -- West Hempstead, New York – May 30, 2016 – West Hempstead, New York author and blogger, Patrick A. Davy, has released his novel, Crime Healer: A Profession for the Brave at Heart. This latest book by the author is about a former correctional officer's encounter with three adolescent gangsters on a New York City subway.

Davy receives the inspiration to write this book from a crime he witnesses while heading home from work one evening. The author uses a clear and easy conversational voice and style that aim to appeal to readers of all audiences.

Most people do not like crimes, and some will do whatever it takes to prevent wrongdoings from happening. This is the case with the main character of the story. The following quote, from the book sums up the protagonist feelings and attitude toward criminality.

“He used to hang out with guys who did all sorts of killings, robberies, loan sharking, and assaulting. You name the crime, they did it....I went into law enforcement so I can prevent crimes like [these] from happening to other people.”

Whether or not you ride the subway or live in a major metropolis, this book helps you imagine the possible occurrences while riding in a crowded city train during rush hour. At times, it will make you feel like crying, and at other times, it will make you burst into laughter.

PATRICK A. DAVY is the author of The Little Big Thinkers: A Collections of Children's Stories, The Will to Win, and The Right to Belong. He is a graduate of the State University of New York College at Oswego and The Writers Group and Institute for Children's Literature in Connecticut. He currently lives with his family.
