“As an elementary teacher, I want children to continue to learn as they go along. Throughout my years of being a teacher, some of my favorite books to read are rhyme books as my students also love to read and listen to them. I've never really seen books that focus on teaching children about animal groups, which is why I began writing the first book in 2005, but changed my mind and put it away for two years. Then, I decided to write the book about land animal groups. I didn't think I'd be writing any more books about animal groups. None were in my head until several months later,” McLaughlin happily shares when asked about what led her to her first step towards publishing her book.
