Global Runtime Application Self-Protection Security Market 2016-2020

PUNE, INDIA, September 30, 2016 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Runtime application self-protection (RASP) protects the network applications from within, as it is integrated along with the application, both during production and during runtime. RASP transforms or blocks malicious content, database queries, and token activity depending on the nature of the implementation. The capabilities of RASP such as coverage, performance, integration, and real-time alerting will depend on its deployment model.
