Mobile computers such as smartphones, tablets, laptops, and notebooks have operating systems that are capable of performing basic functions similar to that of a personal or desktop computer. Mobile computing devices offer location-based services and e-commerce applications when connected to the Internet. Yet, the ability of a mobile computing device to perform different functions depends primarily on its processor speed and memory capacity. Devices such as smartphones and tablets provide the extended function of browsing the Internet on the go, in addition to other computing features.

Research analysts forecast the global mobile computer market to grow at a CAGR of 4.13% during the period 2016-2020.
