This industry comprises establishments of licensed health practitioners having the degree of D.M.D. – Doctor of Dental Medicine, D.D.S. – Doctor of Dental Surgery, or D.D.Sc. – Doctor of Dental Science.

The dental services industry is continuously incorporating new technologies for diagnosis or treatment. New composite materials are being developed for implants. CAD/CAM units, digital radiography, 3-D printers, bulk-fill composites with hand pieces, high-definition (HD) cameras and caries detection devices are other recent innovations. Inclusion of the latest technology has led to more accurate diagnosis and safer treatments with improved aesthetic results. This change has given a boost to the dental services market by improved patient outcomes and increasing the number and range of procedures dentists are able to offer.

Dental hospitals and dental service companies are focusing on including new technologies in their practices to deliver safer, precise and less painful dental service. The dental profession can be classified into eight types of specialism. These are general dentistry, oral and maxillofacial surgery, endodontics, orthodontics, paediatric dentistry, periodontics, oral pathology, and dental public health. Some dental practices offer a combination of these specialisms; others are more specialized.

According to The Business Research Company's Healthcare Consultant, Sravanthi Addapally, individuals are looking on the internet for information on dental issues. They are searching for clinics, doctors and various treatment being offered by independent dentists, clinics or dental hospitals. Many blogs such as deardocor.com, dentalbuzz.com and brightnow.com are publishing articles on dental health and answering individual queries, driving the demand for dental services.

The Business Research Company expects the dental services market to grow to $501 billion in 2019. America was the largest geographic market in the dental services market, accounting for $168 billion or 39.8% share of the global market.
