Programmatic advertising aids advertisers to target a specific audience based on their advertising pattern. The process takes no more than 0.2 seconds. When a user clicks on a URL, a publisher's content loads in the browser. The publisher may find information of the user in its data management software. The publisher sends the available information to its ad server and requests to know whether there is an available ad campaign that can target the user. If there is a campaign that matches the user's profile, an ad is displayed within 0.05 seconds of the user opening the publisher's content.

If no campaign targets a user's profile, the server seeks to match the impression programmatically by requesting response from traders, ad networks, and supply side platforms. If the impression is not cleared, the server may seek to erase the impression in a direct programmatic way through private exchanges. Even then, if the impression is not cleared, the request is forwarded to an open ad exchange, aiming to achieve liquidity. Open ad-exchange sends a bid request containing information about the user's browser, website URL, and ad type to multiple bidders that include traders, ad networks, and demand-side platforms.
