Orbis Research

Language learning, one of the oldest segments of the global education market, within the non-formal education category has improved with the evolution of teaching and learning methods. This has improved the credibility and success rate of services offered in this market, resulting in increased expenditure by individuals, corporates, and educational institutions toward language learning courses. Training in the English language is more prominent in the market compared with other languages, given the importance of the academic and corporate sectors. However, the emergence of other languages will also contribute to market growth in the future. The globalization of business and staggering growth of emerging economies have resulted in some other languages gaining shares in the global language learning market. As a result, the number of learners enrolling for courses to learn languages such as Mandarin, French, Spanish, and Arabic is on the rise.
