E-mails are one of the most important modes of communication among employees of any organization. Confidential data of an organization is exchanged through e-mails over different networks. A number of wired and wireless networks are used for data transmission in an organization, and these networks are vulnerable to malware attacks. As e-mails carry an organization's confidential information, the need for e-mail encryption solutions to avoid data theft or the manipulation of data has increased. E-mail encryption prevents unauthorized access to confidential e-mails. E-mail encryption involves the use of the public-key cryptography method to encrypt messages and a private key to decrypt the message.

With an increase in the number of enterprises across the globe, the number of business e-mail accounts that are created every year and daily business e-mail traffic have increased significantly.
