HOUSTON, TX, U.S., June 20, 2017 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) announced its prediction for above-normal activity for the 2017 hurricane season, earlier this month.

For the upcoming season, which runs through November 30, forecasters predict a 45 percent chance of an above-normal season.

This affects the Gulf Coast region of Texas, including Houston. The residents of these areas must ensure their homes are protected against unforgiving winds, and potentially critical natural disasters, with windstorm-rated and hurricane impact-rated windows from Advanced Window Products.

When life-threatening weather emerges along the coastal areas of Texas, people need to be able to focus on your family's safety, not your windows. The only way to achieve peace of mind about home security during critical weather is to install the proper windows to shield the interior from the storm.

Advanced Window Products offers hurricane-resistant windows that pass the American Architectural Manufacturers Association (AAMA) and American Society for Testing Materials (ASTM) testing required by the Texas Department of Insurance (TDI). Our custom windows are designed to resist high-impact, even in hail, strong winds and torrential rain.

Hurricane impact-resistant windows are constructed and installed to defend your home and family from severe weather, and they are built with high-impact materials in every detail. From the sash to the panes, the components are designed to withstand destructive forces.

With hurricane season in full swing, it's essential to choose windows that will be able to withstand the intense environmental effects of hurricanes and even tropical storms.

Based on a home's location along the coast, owners may be required to have hurricane impact-resistant rated windows. To see where you stand with your window requirements, check out our Coastal Windstorm area map.

Make sure your family and your home are both protected from surges of severe weather this hurricane season—upgrade your windows today with Advanced Window Products!
