Global Atrial Fibrillation Market

Description

According to the NHLBI of the NIH in the US, atrial fibrillation is one of the commonest type of arrhythmia. Atrial fibrillation is similar to another type of arrhythmia of the heart, supraventricular tachycardia. The chief difference between these two types of arrhythmia is the consistency of the beats. In supraventricular tachycardia, the heart beats are regular and at a very fast pace. Patients with atrial fibrillation experience fast and irregular heartbeats. In patients with atrial fibrillation, electrical signals travel rapidly in an uncontrolled way, which causes convulsion, palpitation or contraction in the atria of the heart. Blood is accumulated inside the atrial chambers, instead of flowing to the ventricular chambers. In this case, blood is not pumped into the ventricles fully. Also, the quantity of blood pumped out of the ventricles to the body is irregular and centered on the arbitrary atrial strokes. This can lead to the formation of blood clot in the atria. Stroke occurs in case the clot moves to the brain, which can cause death of an individual. In atrial fibrillation, the ventricles might beat for 100 to 175 times per minute, which is a stark contrast to the normal heart rate of 60 to 100 beats per minute. Atrial fibrillation is more common in older people and is detected using an ECG reading to find out the abnormalities of the electric signal. Some of the symptoms of atrial fibrillation are rapid and irregular heartbeat, palpitations, dizziness, sweating, chest pain, breathlessness, fatigue, and sometimes loss of consciousness.

Covered in this Report

This report covers the present scenario and the growth prospects of the Global Atrial Fibrillation market for the period 2015-2019. To calculate the market size, the report considers the revenue generated from the sales of various drugs such as anti-arrhythmics and anticoagulants used in the treatment of atrial fibrillation.

The report also presents the vendor landscape and a corresponding detailed analysis of the top vendors in the Global Atrial Fibrillation market. The vendor landscape section includes a market share analysis of the major vendors along with the performances of their product portfolios. In addition, it discusses the major drivers that influence the growth of the market. It also outlines the challenges faced by the vendors and the market at large, as well as the key trends that are emerging in the market.
