

Will Your DEAD Bedding Pollutingly Clog a Landfill After Exposing You to Toxics...Or Can It Have a Higher Use?

Here's a way for anyone to lower your environmental footprint—just by finding an alternate use (and source) for something you might have sent to the landfill.

NEW BRUNSWICK, NEW JERSEY, UNITED STATES, July 14, 2017 /EINPresswire.com/ -- When you buy something for your home, how often do you think about the health impact of its use—and what's going to happen to it when you're done?

Think about pillows, for instance. The typical foam bed pillow is a “hot mess” of flame retardants, formaldehyde, and other chemicals that can have negative consequences for your health during your years of using the pillow,* and has no future beyond the landfill (where, if the landfill is not properly run, those chemicals could contaminate water and soil).

Marlon Pando has a better idea. The CEO of White Lotus Home in New Brunswick, NJ, Pando suggests buying pure cotton pillows, enjoying their chemical-free comfort for a few years, and then donating them to farmers who can use the pillows as all-natural organic soil amendments—as compost, in other words.

“You benefit, the farm benefits, the earth benefits,” he says. “You sleep better on a healthy pillow that doesn't emit toxic fumes—and you sleep with a clearer conscience because you're doing the right thing. The farm gets a bit of free compost, as the pillow, made of wool or various organic plants, slowly and gently nurtures the soil. And the earth has a little bit less toxic junk emitting fumes and chemicals in a landfill.”
