The growth in sales value can partially be attributed to the increased demand for super premium bread products and fresh artisan bread. Both of these products are marketed at higher price points than conventional loaves of white or wheat bread.

Global Bakery Products Market - Synopsis & Scenario

The commercial bakery industry has experienced some recent consolidation and is currently undergoing significant changes in how products are marketed and distributed. This consolidation may have been spurred by some excess capacity in the industry. A greater share of the contraction in production facilities was accounted for by smaller operations. The market for frozen cakes, pies, and other pastry products has been characterized by significant product innovation, new product introductions, and an overall shift in the market to higher quality, premium products.

New product introductions from the Sara Lee Corp have focused on higher quality products using better ingredients and improved production and freezing technology. This has led to increases in retail sales value, as consumers purchase higher-priced products, without as significant increases in retail sales volumes. Several factors have been suggested to explain recent changes in bakery product consumption. The three most important are increasing convenience/quick preparation time in the marketing of foods, the prevalence of fad diets that stress the avoidance of carbohydrate rich foods, and the detection of acrylamide, a potentially cancer causing substance in baked and fried foods.
