The global composite filling market in dental restoration is segmented based on material type as nanohybrid, microhybrid, microfilled, nanofilled and other composite fillings. Nanohybrid and microhybrid composites currently dominate the global composite filling market in dental restoration, driven by a wide array of factors including ease of application, reduced sitting period, and easy availability. These materials are also projected to witness high growth rates during the forecast period, driven by increasing demand from the dentists and dental care organizations.

Composite Filling Market Trend and Forecast in Dental Restoration by Material Type

Based on defect class type, class 1 type of defect is likely to remain the largest and fastest-growing defect type during the forecast period. The rising index of the population and unhealthy eating habits amongst teenagers and young children have significantly increased the cases of class 1 defect in the population, supporting high growth of class 1 defect type. Class 5 is the second fastest-growing defect type during the same period.

Europe is expected to remain the largest market for composite filling for dental restoration during the forecast period owing to the higher preference of composite filling over amalgam and the presence of key dental companies in this region. APAC is projected to witness the highest growth during the same period. This is mainly because of high population growth rate in key countries, such as India and

China, and a gradual shift from amalgam to composite filling. Additionally, the rise in demand for regular oral check-ups to have the oral hygiene is further elevating the growth of composite filling in this region.

The supply chain of this market comprises resin suppliers, dental composite filling manufacturers, dentists/dental experts, and patients. The resin suppliers include the chemical/advanced material manufacturing companies, such as 3M and The Dow Company. The dental composite filling manufacturers include Dentsply Sirona, Coltene, The Danaher Corporation, Denmat Holdings, Heraeus Kulzer GmbH, etc. These companies manufacture the dental composite filling materials either in the form of injectable or paste materials along with their accessories as complete dental kits.
