

Pioneer of Open Sexuality Barbara A. Williamson to be Featured on CUTV News Radio

FALLON, NEVADA, UNITED STATES, November 3, 2017 /EINPresswire.com/ -- In the 1950s, if you had sex with someone, you had to marry them! That was the social pressure. You laugh, but it's the truth! This frustration culminated in the Sexual Revolution of the late 1960s, a revolution against sexual tyranny and the control of our sexuality.

As the co-founder of the Sandstone Retreat, Barbara A. Williamson had a front row seat to the Sexual Revolution. She recounts the story of Sandstone Retreat in her book, Free Love and the Sexual Revolution.

"It occurred to me that I should commemorate the actual happening of Sandstone Retreat because no one had ever been so bold as to create an environment like that before," says Williamson. "We had a love community that actually worked. People loved having that sexual freedom."

Founded in 1968, the Sandstone Retreat was a nudist colony and communal sex retreat. On 14 private acres overlooking Malibu and the ocean, the Williamsons and their new friends, including some rather well-known figures of the era, practiced open sexuality.

It was never really about sex. It was about love. Love is the answer.”

“It was considered decadence and a lot of people having a great time partying. We decorated the place beautifully; it was elegant,” recalls Williamson. “But it was all designed for opening and awakening our consciousness and learning about our divine self. We were there to enhance relationships.”

Pioneers of open sexuality, the Williamsons wanted to set society free from sexual tyranny by exchanging partners and engaging in public sex.

“John had actually been doing some research among therapists to find out why our culture was so unhappy. And the answer was sexual repression,” recalls Williamson. “At the time, I too believed sex was something dirty. Something shameful. That was the reason for our engineered environment at Sandstone: to present sex in a positive light.”

According to Williamson, sex has nothing to do with love. Sandstone’s philosophy was that jealousy was incredibly corrosive. As long as there is jealousy, there cannot be love. When we remove the influence of jealousy, then there can be love.

“If I were going to have sex with somebody else, I would tell my partner and be conscious of how much time I spent away,” explains Williamson. “That’s still respecting your partner. There’s consent. Both people feel free and not chained into the marriage.”

Williamson says sexual tyranny was designed to prevent people from being individuals. When we own our sexuality, we’re very much individualized. We can think for ourselves. We can love fully.

“It was never really about sex. It was about love. Love is the answer. Love is the foundation, the most essential idea to experience in our lifetime. If we have a foundation of love for all of ourselves, everything else falls into place.”

CUTV News Radio will feature Barbara A. Williamson in an interview with Jim Masters on November 7th at 1pm EDT.
