Scope

- The palette reflects a hybrid trend that sees manufacturers attempt to infuse make-up with benefits typically offered by skincare products, in order to create a high-performance and quality perception. The functionality-related benefits strengthen the indulgent positioning that helped the Sweet Peach palette achieve a "cult" status.

- Consumers' longing for childhood and carefree lifestyles inspire make-up launches that seem more like toys than functional beauty products. These, however, can be still positioned as upscale and carry a premium price tag, transforming them into collectible gadgets that enable the owner to enhance their status or "self-brand".

- By preceding its product launches with extensive social media ad beauty blogger campaigns, Too Faced fuels initial sales of limited-edition products that are likely to sell out. This contributes to the amount of its media coverage (especially online) and hype, creating a feel of curiosity mixed with anticipation for a re-release.
