

Introducing Victorian Awnings from Radiant Blinds

Radiant Blinds have manufactured Victorian Awnings for many years using the highest quality products.

SURBITON, SURREY, UNITED KINGDOM, April 17, 2018

/EINPresswire.com/ -- Radiant Blinds, manufacturers and installers of quality blinds and awnings, have improved their Victorian Awnings over time to make sure these products can cope with the British weather. They have replaced some of the boxing with a more resistant aluminum casing at the top and back. In the old timber version, the water or snow would rest on the wood and slowly eat into it. Radiant Blinds still use hardwood cheeks and a timber front lath and tacker. The arms are designed to suit the exact requirements of the building and are bent by hand as they were during the time of Queen Victoria. The Victorian awning is operated with a traditional pull down pole.

Radiant Blinds' factory team will paint the lath in a colour of the customer's choice, ideally the same as the shop front so it looks part of the overall installation. Alternatively, a different colour can make a feature of the shop blind. The arms and slides are traditionally black but they can, if the customer chooses, have them finished in the same colour as the box. Radiant Blinds have a huge collection of fabrics to choose from, either plains or stripes depending on what customers want to achieve with the overall look. Radiant Blinds can attach a straight or scalloped valance should one wish – it's all about personal taste.

Making the Victorian Awnings stand out

To really make the Traditional Victorian Awnings stand out, many of Radiant Blinds' customers choose to have some signwriting. Radiant Blinds' experienced signwriters handpaint the covers, valances or both. Since these shop blinds form a fantastic part of any business's advertising, their customers often choose to have their own company logo or branding on the main covers. The valances can carry names, phone numbers and web addresses making them an impressive marketing tool. One can do as much or as little as they like. It's a great opportunity to make the shop or business stand out to passing trade.
