HOUSTON, UNITED STATES, April 27, 2018 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Liquid crystal displays (LCDs) are flat-panel displays or other electro-modulation optics that use light-modulating properties of liquid crystals. Liquid crystals do not emit light directly using backlights or reflectors, instead of producing images in color or black and white. The LCD can display any image or fixed information with a small amount of information that can be displayed or hidden, such as preset words, numbers, and 7-segment displays, such as a digital clock. They use the same underlying technology, except that random images consist of large numbers of small pixels, while other displays have larger elements.
