

IBGX launches amid growing global participation in blockchain from major banks and companies.

NEW YORK, USA, September 3, 2018 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Some of the world's major tech companies are investing in and using cryptocurrencies. For instance, tech giant Microsoft allows customers to use Bitcoin - the world's largest cryptocurrency - as payment for online games and apps. Bitcoin is also accepted by PayPal, amongst many others, as a form of payment.

Cryptocurrencies are beginning to be adopted by established banking groups. For example, the groundbreaking blockchain technology underpinning the majority of cryptocurrencies, is being used by major banks including Barclays and Santander. A foreign exchange service has recently been launched by Santander that uses blockchain technology developed by digital currency, Ripple to make same-day international money transfers. It is reportedly in talks with other major global banks and money transfer groups to develop similar products.

What about cryptocurrency exchange? IBGX is exactly that.

IBGX is a cryptocurrency exchange platform set to be launched this year. Based in Indonesia, the world's 4th largest population, IBGX's team of expertise personnel includes not only programmers of the highest standards, but also from financial industries, always putting clients' priority and security first. Their team experiences are gathered from different walks of life. Be it from the backend building the framework, to the frontend promoting and managing the platform, all information is shared, explored and tuned to the finest details. IBGX aim to build an access around the globe, regardless of time zone differences, all connected on the IBGX platform.
