At present the adoption of Botanical pesticides is very low because of few challenges but it is expected to grow with faster pace in near future.

HYDERABAD, TELANGANA, INDIA, September 3, 2018 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Botanical Pesticides are gaining importance in the modern agriculture techniques with increase in need for environment-friendly agrochemicals and rise in Integrated Pest Management (IPM) practices. Since chemical pesticides are catering to the market in large scale, its toxicity is the matter of concern. Thus botanical pesticides are gaining traction in agriculture. At present the adoption of Botanical pesticides is very low because of few challenges but it is expected to grow with faster pace in near future.

Cost is one of the hindrances for the adoption of botanical pesticides. In addition, lack of awareness and lack of networking among agriculture specialists, growers, consultants and major key influencers, such as government and university researchers are the major challenge in wide spread adoption. Bio pesticide is a new alternative product but it cannot entirely replace synthetic pesticides. Researches are working on Biopesticides to identify the cost effective solution to address their challenges. Chemical or synthetic pesticides are toxic in nature and can cause serious health problems for both humans and pets. To overcome this, industries are producing pesticides from many other organic sources such as Neem, Limonene and Linalool, Sabadilla, Nicotine and so on.

Neem leaves is considered as the most beneficial substance for botanical pesticides; we can use it in the mode of sprays at our home and also spread it in the form of liquid in our farms. Arthropod Pest Management are researching and using neem in the form of oil and cakes, so that the industries can use these techniques to produce their products that can be reliably used in fields as well as in homes. Although biopesticides are an alternative, it will still take lot of time and investment to replace synthetic pesticides in the market.

Currently, Biopesticides constitute a small share in total crop protection market. The US have a large share in the Biopesticides market with variety of products, as compared to the European countries. Currently fewer botanical active substances are introduced in Europe than in the US, India, Brazil and China. U.S Environmental protection agency is using Biopesticides in hydraulic fracturing and wood preservation treatments, which is now increasing the production of Biopesticides products in market. In India 5151 kilotons to 6340 kilotons of Biopesticides are consumed from last 7 years, which describes the rapid growth of Biopesticides.
