Factor driving the PBBA technology is by combining hardware and software into advance integrated system, these fully integrated hybrid solutions are created to simplify the hectic backup process. The appliance keeps a local copy of backups and also transfers that data to remote locations offsite. This sort of system can speed up the backup and recovery process by offloading and uploading the data that typically runs on a local server.

The advent of other new backup and DR solutions such as hyper converge, cloud platform and cloud applications are impacting negatively on demand for PBBA solutions as more companies want to skip the middleman and have backup straight to the cloud. PBBA provides an intermediary point between enterprise systems and the cloud that result in more costly and time consuming process.

The use of PBBA systems are increasing due to the simplified and flexible deployment model with application software built into the PBBA system. Yet, challenges that restrict the market are constrained network/host resources for backup, besides the expanding rise in storage capacity for backup data are negatively impacting the PBBA market.

Most of the enterprises may choose to back up the data to disk first then go to cloud based backup for long term storage. This solves a lot of concerns regarding speedy recovery times and process of recovery. As long as PBBA market will continue to evolve in a way that maximizes security, reliability, and cost-effectiveness, software, appliances and so on, its market is poised for growth.

Most of the enterprises may invest in more than one backup technology for effective data protection, backup and recovery as it does provide backup administrators with greater flexibility to use multiple streams of data to a central appliance. PBBA market will grow with good pace with an advance integrated system for backup and recovery appliances.
