

Emergency Responder Michael J. Riley, Sr., JD starts blog and commentary on Emergency Response Management

Experienced emergency responder's blog will focus primarily on recent developments and foundations of emergency response management and organizations

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, UNITED STATES, October 16, 2018 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Experienced emergency responder Michael J. Riley, Sr. has started a blog and commentary on matters related to emergency response management. He writes based on his "hands on" experience, as he is currently serving the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) as an Emergency Response Manager.

Michael J. Riley, Sr. is planning to inform the public about such emergency response developments that they may not read about in the newspaper or see on television. He notes that "in the business context, while an emergency situation is stressful, chaotic and financially demanding, I often see businesses that are not preparing for future disasters. Preparedness and response planning should be a priority, especially if the business is located in a region or zone that is disaster-prone."

Thus, corporate emergency response plans are fundamental to give a company the best possibilities to reduce the financial and logistical impact of a natural disaster.

Such corporate preparedness programs and applicable response plans should be reviewed for accuracy and effective responses when new or additional variables are identified. This goes hand-in-hand with training employees accordingly. Only employees who are familiar and trained in accordance with the corporate emergency response plan are prepared to apply the best emergency response practices pursuant to the Plan.

Such corporate preparedness programs must take into consideration, for example:

☐☐ Infrastructure: procedural details of computer backups, data restoration methods, the minimum requirements to re-establish business operations.

Companies should consider outsourcing arrangements.

☐☐ Contact lists: emergency personnel must have reliable contact information for all people important for applying the plan. Such contact information should be reviewed frequently.

☐☐ Communications: there must be reliable communication channels to communicate with all parties involved.

☐☐ Logistics & Supply Chain: The plan should include possible alternate resources that may be available, as well as alternative suppliers.

□Essential Personnel: minimum staffing levels must be maintained.

□Equipment: minimum necessary equipment must be provided and launched to minimize down time.

Michael J. Riley will provide more information on such preparedness plans and other emergency response issues on his blog.
