“The Southeast is becoming more engaged in electrifying transportation,” said Josh Cohen, director of public policy and utility programs at SemaConnect. “The City of Atlanta’s EV-ready ordinance is a national model for municipal legislation, and other jurisdictions are beginning to follow Atlanta’s lead. Moreover, utilities throughout the South are recognizing that they have a key role to play in making EV charging accessible and convenient for their customers. SemaConnect is excited about joining SEEA, working with our fellow members, and helping utilities and other stakeholders deploy smart, networked EV charging infrastructure.”

As a member, SemaConnect is exhibiting at the annual 2018 SEEA Conference on Energy Efficiency this week in Atlanta, Georgia. Conference attendees can see live demonstrations of the SemaConnect smart EV charging stations and ask questions about energy requirements. Further promoting professional development and education, SemaConnect offers a monthly USGBC-endorsed webinar for property managers who want to learn more about electric vehicle charging.
