“We have seen enterprise applications come to the fore in both AR and VR.” Mr. Ehrhart shares in the interview, “In AR, we are working with several clients to assist in manufacturing, including machine maintenance, assembly, and test. In VR, we are working with several VR training clients. This VR technology has large-scale applicability and potential to dramatically reduce costs and increase efficiency. These efforts have grown out of individual client requirements, but the elements that are common across clients, are making the solutions consistently effective, cost efficient, and faster to implement.”

Mr. Ehrhart enthusiastically describes his favorite part of running Paracosma: “the greatest pleasure is the fact that VR and AR demand a marriage of art, science, and technology. This is not pure engineering or algorithms; it requires artistic and creative teams and focus. In addition, the future scope in VR and AR is as broad as the real world. We are not limited to one sector or vertical but can add value and make contributions in virtually any area. That keeps things diverse and interesting. Finally, everything we do will continue to improve and expand with technical progress and skills development, so we are also focused on the long-term future potential of the industry.”
