Stem cell research has picked up pace like never before now. The technology is leading to a new kind of cell-based medicine that is regenerative in nature. However, practicality and ethics dominate the ever controversial subject. Hence, it may take some more time, before a proper worldwide consensus emerges on the usage and procedures of stem cell research. While some countries approve, some oppose. Stem cell research is most likely to gather pace in countries with less regulatory controls. Of all the countries, China has the most favorable environment for research. The UK too has a strong research presence. The United States is the leader in stem cell research. However, the government controls the grants for research but places no restrictions on funds from private, state, or local government resources. The global stem cell research market is projected to grow at a CAGR of about 22.50%. Adult stem cells market is the largest tapped market while cord blood and embryonic stem cell markets, though with huge market potential, are still in infancy stages. With government regulations being amended in several countries, stem cell research is expected to pick up pace rapidly in the next few years. Countries are competing globally for getting an edge in stem cell research as breakthrough technologies in this field would herald the country's medical expertise and dominance. Research and laboratory technologies are also progressing rapidly. The potential of stem cell research, both medically and economically, is leading to huge investments by biotechnology companies, pharmaceutical companies and governments too. Stem Cell Research report is an ideal research tool providing strategic business intelligence to the corporate sector.
