Any worker who is injured on the job or who suffers a job-related illness is entitled to workers' compensation for their injuries. Workers' compensation provides medical treatment, wage replacement, and disability compensation to employees who are injured on the job. However, employers' insurance companies are notorious for fighting tooth and nail against workers' compensation claims. Many times, an insurance company will contest an injured worker's qualification for total or partial disability status.

Our top priority will be to get you the maximum benefits as quickly as possible.”

If you've been injured in a work-related accident in Pennsylvania or New Jersey, it is imperative that you speak with an experienced workers' compensation lawyer at the Law Firm of Craig A. Altman as early in the process as possible. When you are suing your employer, there are deadlines you must meet or you may forfeit any benefits you could receive that would pay for medical bills, lost wages and more.

WHAT ARE THE CRITERIA FOR QUALIFYING FOR DISABILITY BENEFITS IN PA AND NJ?

Pennsylvania and New Jersey are both “no-fault” states. This means that an injured worker is entitled to workers' compensation benefits regardless of who caused his or her injury. Although injured workers are generally covered under workers' comp laws in PA and NJ, there are still certain key elements of the laws that must be satisfied, including:

Worker must be considered an “employee.” An independent contractor is disqualified from workers' compensation coverage.

Worker must have suffered an injury.

Worker must have been injured on the job while performing a job-related duty. However, this does not necessarily mean that you had to be at the workplace in order to be covered under workers' compensation law. As long as you were doing something for the benefit of your employer, you should be eligible for workers' comp benefits.

WHAT IS THE WORKERS' COMPENSATION CLAIMS PROCESS IN PENNSYLVANIA AND NEW JERSEY?

You have 120 days to report a work-related injury to your employer. Therefore, it is crucial that you notify your employer as soon as possible about your injury because failure to do so in a timely fashion could result in your claim being barred forever. In Pennsylvania, your employer then has 21 days to investigate the injury, while NJ law requires an employer to immediately notify its insurance carrier.

Your workmans' comp claim will either be approved or denied by your employer. If there is a dispute, your employer's insurance company will probably direct you to undergo an examination conducted by an independent doctor. You are required to go to the doctor approved by your employer. However, it is also important for you to consult with an attorney and receive an independent medical examination because you will probably need a doctor to testify on your behalf at a medical expert deposition.

WHAT DO I DO IF MY WORKERS' COMPENSATION CLAIM IS DENIED?

If your workers' compensation claim is denied, you should contact an experienced lawyer who can help you file a claim with the appropriate agency. You have three years from the date of the injury to file a claim in PA. It is imperative that you seek the advice of an experienced workers' comp attorney because there are highly complex rules and complicated procedures involved in workers' compensation claims. These disputes are not heard in NJ or PA court systems; they are heard before special courts that deal exclusively with workers' compensation disputes.

Additionally, it is crucial that you speak with an attorney early in the process because even if you are initially approved for workers' compensation benefits, your employer may later decide to suspend, modify, or terminate your benefits. If this happens, you are going to need a skilled workers' compensation lawyer to argue your case at a hearing. Beyond that, you may later wish to file an appeal if your injury has worsened since filing the initial claim.
