The California Equal Pay Act has been in force since 1949, prohibiting employers from paying employees who perform the same work different wages based on the employee's gender. Despite the law, however, female workers' wages continue to stagnate behind their male co-workers, estimated at 80% of the male co-workers' wages. As such, California legislature has continued to pass legislative initiatives and updates aimed at remedying this disparity.

One law aimed at addressing wage disparity is the prohibition against employers asking applicants about their salary history. Furthermore, the law also prohibits employers from using salary history in making hiring decisions. It does not, however, restrict employees from volunteering their salary history without prompting from the employer and the employer considering such history in setting the employee's salary once volunteered. Still, such history cannot be the sole factor in disparity between male and female co-workers.

One of the provisions of the California Equal Pay Act received further clarification with a recent legislative update. The law required employers to provide a pay scale for the position sought to an applicant upon reasonable request. Previously, the key terms such as “applicant” and “reasonable request” were undefined by the statute. A recent update has provided definition for these terms. “Applicant” is defined as “an individual who is seeking employment with the employer and is not currently employed with that employer in any capacity or position.” “Reasonable request” is defined as a “request made after an applicant has completed an initial interview with the employer.”

There are certain acceptable reasons for disparity in pay. For example, employers may pay similarly situated employees differently based on seniority or merit system. Different pay may also be justified on quantity or quality of work. There is also the broad catch-all of a “bona fide factor other than sex, race, or ethnicity.” Employer relying on such bona fide factor would have to show some reasonable basis for disparity in pay based on business necessity. Also, employers may not prohibit employees from discussing their salary amongst themselves.

With continued focus on pay equality, entrepreneurs will have to ensure their pay structure and hiring practices comply with relevant state and federal requirements, notes Cyrus Batchan.
