In this class, students learn financial basics, like savings and checking accounts. They also learn about more complex money management lessons, like overdraft fees and retirement planning.

“With these lessons, we’re preparing our students to enter the world as financially independent and responsible adults,” says Robert Lysek, founder and CEO of the Lehigh Valley charter school.

Youth Financial Literacy, a nonprofit, is dedicated to helping students learn financial responsibility and establish financial goals to guide them through their futures.

Money Management is just one of many courses offered by EEACS that strives to prepare students for the “real world.” The school’s one-of-a-kind business education curriculum teaches students about career awareness, partners students with mentors, and gives high schoolers internship opportunities.
