Latest Update of Consumer Goods Industry 2019:

Shopping goods are generally defined by goods whose purchase require extensive planning and thought in comparison to convenience goods. Shopping goods come with longer durability and are more expensive. They have longer lifespans than convenience goods. Shopping goods include electronic appliances, furniture, and dresses. The purchase decision for this category of goods is generally preplanned and comparison influences the consumer's mind to a large extent.

Convenience goods are readily available for purchase and are consumed on a daily basis. Convenience goods are mostly sold by retailers and wholesalers. The goods normally include items like cold drinks, medicines, ice-cream, magazines, cigarettes, etc. Convenience goods can be further classified into impulse convenience goods (non-priority goods such as cigarettes) and staple convenience goods (meeting basic customer needs). The prices of these goods are mostly standardized, and these are usually bought from convenient locations.

Unsought consumer goods are readily available but are bought by only a few members of the available market. These goods are not generally purchased frequently and often serve particular demands such as life insurance and car insurance schemes.
