The semiconductor industry is driven by technological changes and adoption of new devices for making daily tasks simpler. Smartphones, laptops, refrigerators, washing machines, and other such appliances have integrated chips at its core. Even trivial items such as light bulbs are equipped with semiconductors. The semiconductor industry forms the cornerstone of many technologies that have become fundamental to human lives. Semiconductors are setting the stage for technology modernization by digitizing industries such as healthcare, transport, financial systems, defense, agriculture, and retail, and others. With various high-growth sectors reaching commercialization, the semiconductor industry is poised for prolific growth. The 'smart' revolution would not have been possible without the very basis of microchip processors. There is a chip in almost everything ranging from smart devices, autonomous vehicles to smart medicines. Growing demand for computers, automobiles, electronics, wearable devices, home appliances, consumer drones, and related infrastructure has induced high demand for semiconductors.
