Financial institutions are growing more than contented partnering with, and in many ways behaving like fintechs. The more the banks are digitizing their processes, the more they are making decisions and leveraging based on analytics and data. They're increasingly focusing on customer experiences that spread beyond mobile and web devices. They are doing so at rapid pace by espousing new delivery techniques.

Financial institutions are gradually learning that to strive with an ever-growing group of rivals, and to uphold market share and relevancy, they need to be more technologically advanced and strategically aware to be able to meet the consumer expectations. Therefore, there has been an intense focus on consumer channel innovation, business process automation, core modernization, and digitization as banks attempt to become completely digital.
