The film written and directed by Cayce tells a gripping urban story about a day in the life of two Los Angeles-based rival gang members: Crip and Blood, who are first cousins. Curtis, an unreformed ex-inmate who was recently released from jail, ask Terrance to drive him to a job interview but they stop at the bank. Unbeknownst to Terrance, Curtis intends to rob the bank. In a panic, Terrance and Curtis quickly leave the scene of the crime with no plan. The events that unfold change the course of their future and the lives of two innocent hostages. "This film is more prevalent today because of the continuing senseless killing in urban communities across the Nation involving gangs, territory and hopelessness," said Cayce. "I wanted to tell a story about how dangerous it is when you are in the wrong place at the wrong time and when desperation takes over. People have to end the vicious cycle of violence, think before reacting and find a Plan B, a better, alternative solution."

"As the executive producer on the film, I wanted an authentic voice to restate "A Day of Trouble"

His new identity led him to take his hobby of rapping to a professional level. "Rapping was a way to express myself and let out the struggles I was going through internally," said MAC3.
