Construction

The construction industry consists of diverse enterprises that have expertise in producing a broad range of products. But the major portion of these enterprises that deal with on-site construction are local and small. A prevalent trend among the enterprises in the construction industry is outsourcing the supply of goods and services needed during the process of production. Building materials, equipment, and plant are usually bought or hired from other enterprises. Specialized services are generally provided by subcontractors, whereas labor is supplied by labor agents. In addition, services like design and engineering are generally supplied by different professional entities within the industry.

In recent years, there has been a host of technological advances in the industry, mostly the rising use of environment-friendly technologies. The need for rigorous training for workers in enterprises is increasing, so such changes can be handled more efficiently. With various government activities that are linked with construction being decentralized, there is a rise in new challenges for local authorities that participate in a large amount of construction activities via direct administration or contracting private enterprises.
