Packaging, construction, and manufacturing are the three key sectors that drive revenue in every economy. This industry has witnessed a remarkable transformation in the past few decades.

Packaging in the current age plays a more complex role than merely making containers at the time of sales, logistics, and end use. Today it is also an extremely crucial element with regards to product design, marketing, branding, and user experience. With an increase in the worldwide demand for packaging, the packaging industry will be more heavily influenced through developments in manufacturing equipment and technology, environmental concerns, industry dynamics, and consumer preferences.

Toady consumers have become more sensitive towards the environmental impacts of packaging. Thus, manufacturers and brands are constantly looking for means for improving their packaging materials and making an impression in the customers minds. The trend of green packaging is a small step towards eco-friendliness and augmenting the overall brand image. The emergence of renewable and bio-based raw materials together with the use of compostable materials have propelled the demand for such green packaging solutions.

Growing urbanization globally coupled with the increasing disposable income have resulted in an increasing demand of luxury packaging. This form of packaging has become essential to pack premium consumer goods namely soaps, face creams, body creams, lipstick, conditioners, and shampoos. Flexible packaging is another trend that is propelling the growth of the packaging industry. More and more manufacturers and brands will be adopting it owing to its alluring features such as practicality, sustainability, convenience, cost-effectiveness, and premium quality.
