Consumer good refers to any tangible commodity that is produced and purchased to cater to the wants and needs of the buyer. Consumer goods can be segmented into three categories, namely durable goods, nondurable goods, as well as services.

Consumer durable goods are known for their long-life span, generally three years or more however sometimes few consumer goods with life spans of one year can also be termed durable. Similar to the capital goods like machinery, equipment, and buildings, a durable good can be consumed throughout its life span, which leads to strong demand for number of maintenance services. With the high number of similarities in the maintenance and consumption patterns of capital and durable goods sometimes blur the line between both of them. Most of the times, the high cost of durable goods causes consumers to postpone spending on them, which makes them the most cost-dependent element of consumption. Some examples of such consumer durable goods include furniture, automobiles, mobile homes and household appliances.
