Activity related to the upgradation of a portion of the structure or site which keeps the attached devices steady significantly forms the part of support facilities. The support facility requires to be specifically designed to make the devices and industrial fixtures function properly. The support facilities are the backbone of the industrial fixtures and devices that improves their performance.

In order to identify support facilities, the part of the building is thoroughly examined. An apt example of support facility could be cited inside an extremely specialized edifice such as a vibration elimination slab under a microchip clean room. If the slab wouldn't be there, the hypersensitive devices within the clean room would fail to run properly. The walls and ceilings of the clean room cannot be considered as support facilities since they only expound a definite space and not a function linked to the device or industrial fixture.
