Genetic modification is likely to take on a key role in the agriculture sector in the coming years as producers try to develop strains that yield more along with reducing the consumption of resources and being more resistant to diseases and pests. This is likely to be a key driver in the agriculture sector in the coming years, with the development of genetically modified crop strains emerging as a profitable avenue for private investors and being embraced by government bodies due to its benefits in enhancing agricultural output. Genetically modified crops have already played a major role in global history, with Norman Borlaug's Green Revolution in India, Mexico, and other developing countries estimated to have saved more than a billion lives that would have otherwise been lost to starvation. The development of genetically modified high-yielding crop strains was a key principle of the Green Revolution, along with the use of mechanized management practices and chemical fertilizers and pesticides.
