USA, August 18, 2019

/EINPresswire.com/ -- According to statistica, which surveyed just over 1,000 workforce hiring decision-makers, 56% of managers or solo-professionals reported turning to freelancers or organizations to scale up quickly for a new project. This made increasing project needs the most common cause given for bringing on freelance talent or creative organizations—ahead of leveraging skills unavailable in-house (49%), filling staffing shortages (49%), and saving money (36%).

Scaling projects quickly isn't just about man-hours. It's about finding the right talent or organizations that understand how to work efficiently and effectively within the parameters of a given project. That might mean bringing on a team of contractors to work short-term or long-time until the project is completed. It might also mean engaging independent professionals or strong background organizations who have honed their ability to manage projects like the one you're considering through their efforts in past roles.

However, hiring the right freelancer or an employee remotely had been a tough call for most clients and organizations, as they struggle through scanning or interviewing different remote workers. There are situations where several types of workers could be appropriate; selecting between them comes down to a judgment call regarding a client's needs or organization's needs and resources.
